

Belize is a land marked by astounding diversity in its geography, its people and its wildlife. The number of birds in an area acts as a great indicator of biodiversity – more than 500 species have been recorded in Belize, an area smaller than the state of Massachusetts.

Almost 400 of these species have been recorded at the Lamanai Outpost Lodge and its diverse surroundings. Located on a remote hillside along the New River Lagoon in the Orange Walk district, Lamanai’s many and varied habitats make for some of the best birding in Central America. Within a 15 minute walk of the lodge are mature tropical and semi-deciduous forests, forests in various stages of succession, milpas, and brushy fields. A short ride across the lagoon will take you to a completely different habitat – the pine savannah – with totally different birds.

As with any tropical country, Belize’s avifauna is still being explored. New discoveries and debate over the documentation of some sightings leave the extent of this country’s accepted number of species in a constant state of flux. The most up-to-date and thorough work on Belize’s avifauna is Howell & Webb’s A Guide to the birds of Mexico and Northern Central America (1995). As such, it has generally been used to determine whether or not a given species occurs in the country. There is some minor deviation due to recent sightings. Many species attributed to Belize by Wood & Leberman (1967) and Wood et al. (1966) were not accepted by Howell & Webb, but are included in this list with a (?) to indicate uncertain status. Birds that have been recorded at Lamanai Outpost Lodge and surrounding areas (Lamanai Archaeological Preserve, Indian Church village, the New River Lagoon and its tributaries, pine-oak savannah along the east bank of the lagoon and the Blue Creek rice fields) are marked with an asterisk (*).
